

Prehistoric Communities along the Danube

Different parts of historic Middle Danube region represented a culturally and historically integral unit for several millennia. In contrast, modern borders divide them into different worlds by cutting traditional ties. Even archaeology has not remained untouched by these tendencies.

In the last decades, large-scale rescue excavations accompanied by new technologies applied during fieldworks and assessments, provided new opportunities for both the Hungarian, Croatian and Serbian archaeological research. The international event aims to offer a platform to discuss separately achieved results within the frames of a round-table conference. It focuses on interpreting the archaeological record and the exchange of experiences of various scientific methods. The final purpose is to create a regional synthesis on a cross-border level.

Danube Neolithic landscapes

The role of the Danube as a major communication line in prehistory has always been emphasized. In the broader Belgrade area, the landscape is dominated by this great river, but it is also home to the two type-sites of the early and late Neolithic period – the Starčevo – Grad and the Vinča – Belo brdo settlements. These two partially contemporaneous settlements co-exist and share the same landscape during the Early Neolithic period, while the Late Neolithic communities along the Danube are faced with a different distribution of the Neolithic sites. The landscapes, as well as the economies, site-catchments, and lifestyles of these settlements are immensely influenced by the Danube and its position.

Here presented are the results of the first geoarcheological and environmental investigations in this micro-region, focusing on the questions of Holocene Danube movements, reconstruction of the landscape and communication in the area. Position of the Danube next to the Starčevo site is reconstructed, and the Vinča and Starčevo lifestyles addressed.

Starčevo culture luxury: cult objects and personal ornaments made of stone

Starčevo culture, the first Neolithic culture in the central Danubian region in the South-eastern Europe, occupied the wide territory of today's Eastern Slavonia and whole Serbia. Several centuries of its existence (c. 6200 - 5400 BC) resulted with the creation of economic and technological basis for the development of progressive and highly developed Late Neolithic cultures of southern Pannonia and the central Balkans – the Vinča culture and the Sopot culture. Many aspects of the Starčevo culture have remained poorly studied so far. One of them are decorative and cult objects made of stone. Decorative and cult objects in general are rare in the Starčevo culture, which is certainly associated with a small number of graves discovered so far. Personal ornaments were made mainly from osseous raw materials (bone, antlers, teeth, marine shells) and cult objects mostly from clay. It can be assumed that other less permanent materials (wood, leather, etc.) were also in use. Stone was used in production of small personal ornaments like beads, pendants and rings. Small-sized stone tools like miniature chisels of nephrite and calcite, as well as grooved little pebbles (also considered as fishing weights) most likely were amulets. Amulets in the shape of a bovid head, which are characteristic exclusively for the Starčevo culture, were mainly made of clay and rare stone specimens were usually made of marble and white limestone. According to the selection of raw materials it is possible to assume that the standard in the production of stone cult and decorative objects did not exist in the Starčevo culture craftsmanship. However, the more frequent use of marble and calcite, the basic raw material for making stone decorative and cult objects in Late Neolithic Vinča and Sopot cultures, shows that the advantages of these stone raw materials (light processing, high gloss after polishing) were already recognizedby Starčevo culture craftsmen.
